- to look at the project with eyes of anybody else - to be simple and estimate in writings - to write creative title - to interpret my point of view, because the originality is important

In today's class, I learnt how to put the topic of my dissertation into words for an audience that is not closely connected to my field of study. I learnt how to open my mind to various interpretations of situations, and how to find a way to understand other people's research even when I'm not a specialist in it. On a more technical note, I learnt to use Padlet. :) Thank you!

During this lesson I liked the most the communication between teacher and students and the activity about the picture with fish, because I have realized how differently we think and see things.

For me, the most enjoyable parts were interpreting pictures because it's fascinating for me to hear other people's interpretations of the same situation or phenomenon. However, the most beneficial part was prioritising 3 out of the 6 tips on project proposal writing. I think it's important to be aware of what matters most in the process and put the biggest effort into that. I always want to do everything, but sometimes, less is more, and it's good to narrow down my priorities a bit, or at least order them. The discussion with the other students helped me realise a lot of similarities among doctoral students from very different areas. I like that. I enjoyed the whole seminar. Thank you!

How I start writing abstract and the aquarium. Sorry I can't pick one :)
