

1. The aim is to develop transferable communication skills in English through an interactive learning infrastructure. It will link academic and non-academic worlds, provide opportunities for training and retraining, and reflect the needs of practice.

The programme objectives will be achieved by setting up and running virtual transnational (between Wales, Czech Republic, Spain, Bosnia and Turkey) and transversal (between academic and professional) study circles:

- by developing training and learning materials for academic and professional purposes;
- by making effective use of advanced technological resources for authentic communication tasks (videoconferencing, internet);
- by creating an internationally accessible virtual learning environment (through development and use of an open subject village web site) and by matching the academic outcomes with the needs of prospective employees.

This project makes an original contribution to intercultural communication in English.

2. The main limitation of your paper is that of novelty: a number of similar studies have appeared in the last few years and it is not clear how this paper differs or adds to the existing literature. The main contribution of the paper seems to be the detailed analysis of the 'Wikiline' programme. While it is of course quite interesting to understand the technical workings of a programme, the paper would be more solid if it also provided results that either are unique to this type of programme or that can be applied more generally to the wiki programmes problem. Given that the mechanisms employed by 'Wikiline' are rather conventional and have been discussed before, you could try to leverage the relatively unusual targets (embedded devices) to address this problem.

3. There is no doubt that media, especially the internet and magazines, are the main reasons that Earth has become a small village (globalization). Moreover, nowadays both the internet and magazines are considered as windows for requirements of daily life from learning to travelling. The media has changed many roles in my country, which is Saudi Arabia. However, as a coin has two sides, it is also the same for the media, which has both its advantages and disadvantages and difference between female and male. So I will discuss that in this paper.

4. In times of uncertainty, times when it seems as if our institutions, practices, moralities, and modes of knowledge are unable to cope with the realities of everyday life, the conditions of this choice are not as obvious as they might be in times of quiet satisfaction. At times, when our ideas no longer furnish meaningful answers, when the course we normally travel appears to be blocked, we tend to subject the ways of our lives to cutting scrutiny. We tend to ask questions about prevailing notions of obligation, authority, and justice, as well as the conditions of peace, order, and security, all in the hope that we might say something meaningful about how human beings should live their lives and how they should treat their neighbours.
