Computers played an essential role in this textbook's publication. Authors use word processing software to create the first draft of each chapter. This draft uses special formatting to _____ compositors how to organize and lay out the content so that it not only is attractive and readable, but has educational value. Once the first draft is complete, editors use various tools in the word processing software to make and show their changes, as well as to add comments and questions. The authors then _____ to these comments and questions and make changes based upon editor feedback. The authors then _____ the revised electronic document to the compositor, who uses the document, along with all accompanying instructions, to _____ a first version of how the chapter will look once it is _____. Using desktop publishing programs, such as QuarkXPress or Adobe InDesign, the compositors _____ tasks such as creating the layout, _____ and formatting headings, changing fonts and font styles, adding graphical elements, and _____ page numbers. The authors, editors, and proofreaders then _____ an electronic copy of the chapter, specifically a PDF file, and use document management software such as Adobe Acrobat to _____ layout changes, text changes, or formatting changes that need to be made. Because multiple people review and edit each chapter, they all send their comments to an individual who then _____ all comments into one document and sends it back to the compositor for the next draft. This process continues until the authoring team _____ no further changes. Once all chapters have been composed and are in their final version, the compositor then prepares and sends the files to the printer. The printer, or company _____ to produce the printed textbook, then uses the files to print and _____ the textbook.
